

The World Football Atlas 2016

The World Football Atlas 2016 is a thematic Atlas about the complex, widespread and economically relevant world of football. The leading objective we ourselves set is to describe through maps the most important aspects of the game of football by means of selection of reliable statistical data and the use of clear cartographic symbols. Demographic distribution of players, rivalries between supporters, average age per team, economic values of the main clubs and sponsorship are only some of the aspects of the more than 60 maps that are included in the World Football Atlas 2016. The atlas, entirely composed of descriptive maps and infographics with a minimal presence of explicative text, puts in evidence aspects that the media, both broadcasting and newspapers, usually ignore. An example is the chapter dedicated to women football around the world and the growing attention it is receiving by clubs and spectators. We certainly were not able to describe the entire world of football in all its aspects. The main reason of this is that we worked with a deep lack of verifiable and available data. Although there is a wide possibility to obtain informations by the specialized media, we have noticed that the statistics about the game of football describe in fact different behaviours and habits. All regional and single state football organizations present a deep lack in publishing their data and often organizations show they have no data at all. Therefore what is clear is that the majority of football phenomena around the world are still covered by opacity and a lack of transparency. However, the case of Europe is significantly different. In fact the UEFA organization and other European football clubs associations publish many reports about different and specific themes and subjects. At the same time, anyway, it is hard to find reliable informations and statistics on other geographical areas such as Africa or Asia. As for Northern and Southern America, where the game of football is developed and where the volume of the market is evolving rapidly, there is a poor quantity of precise official information about these regions football.

In terms of contents, we observed that the game of football is a typically European sport phenomenon, deeply absorbed and embedded into the culture, the society, the politics and the economy of the most important countries of the continent. The relation between football and the politics in southern countries of Europe is particularly strong, while in northern Europe there is a special tie between the clubs and the territory where they are located. What about the rest of the world? We often read on the media that the future of football is in China or in the United States, but what we argue is that in these countries the popularity of football game is not steeped into the society or rather its at the same level of other sport events. As for the scientific side, in writing the World Football Atlas we adopted a twofold method: first, we considered the classical geopolitical variables to identify the main actors and their behaviours; second, and the most importantly, we decided to focus our work on the simplicity of communication. Therefore, the maps are not cluttered with data, graphs and images, but are instead designed to be easy to read and to understand since we inserted exclusively what is strictly necessary.
