

The Mother in Education

This volume was published in 1914 and discusses early 20th century theories on child-rearing and education and the powerful influences of the mother. From the books Foreword: Is there any joy so pure and complete as that of seeing a young nature unfolding day by day under your influence and training ? And when that child is your own, and all the comfort and recompense of his development will belong to you, does not the pleasure of his education, so far as you can contribute to it, become irresistible? Believing as I do, that an intelligent mother can do wonderful things in the mental education of her child, as well as in that far more important matter, development of his character, I put it forward noty only as an urgent duty, but as one of a womans best privileges, to give of her higher energies to her childs development. The great lesson of this century is that of a broader humanity. We are best when we give out most, smallest when we live merely for ourselves. The fine privilege of an equal education with men has been given to women. Surely, they can employ it in no better way than in giving to the world better citizens. In education the beginning is everything. Happy is that child whose foundation has been well laid at home, before he goes to school where he will be dealt with as one of a crowd! What I state I have proved by practice. I know that school education can be shortened by several years through the efforts of a mother, and that nothing outside can supply the place of an atmosphere of home culture. Nor is the work complicated or hard. The scheme outlined in this book is so practical and simple that it will surely appeal to all mothers who desire to do their best by their children. To such I dedicate it, with the earnest hope that they may find as much satisfaction in it as I did while working it out in actual practice. For permission to reproduce some matter which has appeared in their pages in the form of magazine articles thanks are due the Womans Home Companion and the New England Magazine. F. H. W.
