

This book will be of great help to black women who are weighing up the idea of interracial dating and wondering if it is something for them! Black women often grow up believing they can only be with black men. Along the way they internalize many other notions that further close off the idea of other races of men for love and relationships. However of recent, black women have had reason to look again at their views on who and where to date. "Supposing I wanted to date a White Guy...?" sets out to comprehensively address the many concerns black women have around interracial dating including the following real life questions fielded by black women themselves: -"Will dating out change me essentially as a black woman? -"Can this kind of relationship really bring me satisfaction as a black woman ? -"How will others interpret my actions?" -"How do I reconcile this with what I believe black womanhood is about?" Black womens reservations to dating white men, the history and politics behind it are fully explored in this book. In addition, "Supposing I wanted to date a White Guy...?" will provide needed answers to all those general but persistent questions that come up with the issue of black people dating across the race, questions like, 'Why do black men date out?' and 'Are black women to blame?', 'Is the black race set to disappear because of interracial dating?' However this is not just a theoretical book with black woman placed as the spectators, in its latter sections, this book serve as a handbook for black women who have finally made the decision to include interracial relationships as an option. It will provide clear answers to issues like: getting started, forging an interracial connection, tackling the thorny issues that race can bring up in the relationship, overcoming third party opposition, making it work, and more...--About the Author--Halima Anderson studied counselling. She has written for major black magazines. Her special passion and focus is black women living optimal lives. This work comes out of over five years interviewing, researching and investigating the topic of interracial relationships from the black females perspective. "Supposing I wanted to date a White Guy...?" will give black women a guided-tour of the topic of interracial dating before they try it for real! Ultimately they will get the opportunity to answer the question, "Is dating white men something for me?"
