

Do you love to write? Are you interested in the world around you? Are you intrigued by the challenges of problem solving? If so, a career as an advertising copywriter may be for you. Every time you page through a magazine or newspaper, watch television or listen to the radio, or see a billboard on the highway, you are exposed to the work of advertising copywriters. These are the people who create the language of advertising. Copywriters write the headlines and the body copy, or text, for print advertising (magazines, newspapers, billboards). Copywriters also create the scripts for broadcast advertising (TV and radio commercials). The companies, stores, and other organizations that advertise their products, services, and statement of ideology may create their own advertising in house, or they may use an outside advertising agency to create the advertising for them. Accordingly, an advertising copywriter may work for an advertising agency or for the advertiser itself. At an agency, the copywriter works with a number of different people and departments to create a print ad or commercial. For example, the research department determines who the target audience is - that is, the group of people who are most likely to buy the advertiser's product or service. It is this group the copywriter must appeal to. The media department decides where to place the ad - in what magazine or during which television program - in order to reach the target audience. These decisions, too, will affect the kind of advertising the copywriter creates. And the clients, the ones offering the product or service to be advertised, are certain to want to have some input on the project. Broadly speaking, everything that sells is advertising, from a multi-million-dollar potato chip commercial during the Super Bowl to a tiny notice about a garage sale appearing in the classified section of the newspaper. Ultimately, the purpose of advertising is to persuade people to behave or believe as the advertiser would like them to. Advertising that does not get people to act is a failure. Therefore, even though copywriters may use catchy jingles, slogans, or humor to create effective advertising, copywriters are not just clever wordsmiths. They are also problem-solvers. Their job is to look at an old problem in a fresh way, to figure out how to attract the attention of their target audience and convince this group of people to buy a product, service, or political or other message. The American public is confronted with such a barrage of advertising images on a daily basis, most of us have learned to tune them out. Sometimes it's as simple as changing the TV channel or clicking the mute button on the remote control. So the next generation of advertising talent will have to devise innovative and powerful new ways of stopping people and commanding their attention. Advertising is an exciting profession. Being a copywriter is challenging and rewarding. This is a job where you can go to work in jeans, work with interesting people, have a great deal of fun - and can make a great deal of money. However, although the financial rewards in advertising can be great, they are by no means guaranteed. The key reason successful people are drawn to the copywriting profession is that they have a burning desire to create. In this Careers Ebook, we will introduce you to the exciting world of advertising. You'll learn what goes on in the typical day in the life of a copywriter, where the jobs are, what personal qualities are necessary for success, what kind of education and training you should pursue, and what you can do to get started preparing for this career right away. Plus, you'll get a first-hand look at what it's like to work in this field from our interviews with some people who have made copywriting their career.
