

The Pachuco Era (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Pachuco Era Unique material for the study of Chicano history and Chicano art history came to the UCLA Library at least as early as the 1930s, when it received from Miss Lucy Starr, sister of University of Chicago historian Frederick Starr, a gift of prints by the Mexican artist Jose Guadalupe Posada. The work of this artist - particularly his playful calavera [skull] imagery - was one influence on Chicano artists as they sought to create an art free of European and Anglo-American influence to express a unique heritage. Material relevant to the theme of this exhibit came to the library in 1945, when Alice McGrath turned over records of the Sleepy Lagoon Defense Committee to Robert Vosper, then head, Acquisitions Department. Carey McWilliams gave the library his collection of material on topics of interest in the history of Mexicans and Mexican Americans in California. The collections have been used continually ever since. Luis Valdez has noted that reading a battered copy of Guy Endores The Sleepy Lagoon Mystery set in motion his thoughts about what became his play Zoot Suit. The department also has the papers of Guy Endore. The UCLA Oral History Program, administered by this department, has further documented this period in interviews with Endore, McGrath, McWilliams, and others. Material is regularly added in support of research in this period and all periods of Chicano history. I am pleased to announce the acquisition, on the occasion of this exhibit of a print of the color photograph, Clavo, by Los Angeles Chicano artist John M. Valdez. The department is privileged to mount The Pachuco Era in conjunction with Chicano Art: Resistance and Affirmation (CARA), 1965-1985.
