

The Public Health: An Address Delivered at Cambridge in the Section of Public Medicine of the British Medical Association (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Public Health: An Address Delivered at Cambridge in the Section of Public Medicine of the British Medical Association

When I had the honour of addressing this Association, as President, at Oxford, in 1868, airy complete national Health organization was still a thing of the future. Now the general working of the Public Health Administration in Great Britain and Ireland is to be brought before the present Meeting as the first subject for discussion. This arrangement makes it unnecessary that I should occupy time with any lengthened remarks from the Chair upon the present state of such Administration; but it may assist the objects of the discussion if I remind the Meeting, very briefly, of some of the steps by which the Public Health Administration in this country has reached its present position. This may be best done by referring to a passage in the Eighth Report of the Local Government Board (1878, cxxviii). In 1871 the Local Government Board was established, and the powers and duties of the Poor Law Board under the Poor Law Acts, of the Secretary of State under the Registration Acts, the various Sanitary Acts, and the Local Taxation Return Act, and of the Privy Council under the Prevention of Diseases, and the Vaccination Acts, were transferred to the new Board thus created, while in the following year, the powers and duties of the Board of Trade under the Alkali Acts, and the Metropolis Water Acts, and of the Secretary of State under the Highways and Turnpikes Acts were in like manner transferred to the Department. In 1872 the whole country was, by an Act passed at the instance of the then President of the Board, divided into Urban and Rural Sanitary Districts, and each District was placed under the jurisdiction of one Sanitary Authority and one only, and provision made for the establishment of a Port Sanitary Authority for every port in England and Wales. In 1874 we introduced a Bill providing for various amendments in the Sanitary Laws, which our administrative experience had shown to be imperatively required. In 1875 a measure prepared by us was passed for consolidating the whole of the Sanitary Laws into a single Statute, thus reducing into a methodical and complete whole provisions which hitherto had been scattered over no less than twenty-two separate Acts of Parliament.
