Not illustrated. 1734 Excerpt: ... whose veracity they are well aflured (and such an one, it cannot be denied; but many of the most ignorant and illiterate vulgar, if they exercise the same care and prudence as they would in chusing a person, to advise and manage for them in the common affairs of life, may eajily find) and let him lay before them fairly and impartially the substance of the argument oh both fides; upon which they may maturely deliberate and determine. Tis evident, that in this case they do not take the judgment of another about at point of speculation, but only his representation of a matter of fact: they do not trust to his understanding, but his integrity. If it be said, that they trust his understanding so far, viz. to give them a judicious state 6f the argument in its full strength: I answer; that the People may indeed make a wrong choice; but, as I hinted before, if they are sincerely desirous to be rightly informd, there are vast numbers, to whom it will be no great difficulty to pitch upon a person whose capacity cannot be disputed; so that there will be but little danger of their being imposed on, if they can rely upon his honesty. However for their greater security they may N 2 apply apply to several, and try how far their accounts agree. And let it but be allowed, that persons who have such opportunities, and act with that prudence and caution which the importance of the inquiry deserves, may have as good reason to be satisfied in this cafe, as they have in other matters of the greatest moment, wherein they depend upon the information of men of known abilities, and unquestionable veracity, we defne no more. For this supposes, that they may have a sufficient probability of the truth of the Christian religion; such a probability as
