Not illustrated. 1870 Excerpt: ...enthusiasm. I never had much pocket-money, and he never had such plums, was the answer, during consumption of the plump deliciousness. But the holidays came to an end. One morning the roofs did not ring their echo inside to boyish laughter. Outside they were covered with snow. The flowers were all faded. The dead bodies of many of them were disregarded by the heedless winter wind. The roses hung their heads as orphan children do in heartless cities where they feel the pinchings of want, and no one is left to care for them. It was the month of October. The carriage had just driven away from The Turrets, with Mrs. St. Victor and Frank and William inside. The indispensable Claude rode behind. RANK made many friends at school. This was mainly due to his gentleness and modest bravery; but no doubt his abundant supply of pocket-money would have its own peculiar influence on some. Franks pocket-money did not bum holes in his purse, neither was any great proportion of it spent on himself to the exclusion of others. At the same time, he was but seldom invited by the parents of his school-fellows to visit them at home. One day Mrs. Butt, the mother of a rather forward boy who was dreadfully anxious to get a prize, invited Frank to her house. I hear you are a great gun, Mr. Miller, she said while supplying Frank with a few chestnuts. I wish you would just let one of your superfluous prizes slip our Charleys way. Frank was enraptured, and forthwith he vowed to TOO LOUD. 163 himself that Charley Butt should get a prize, if he could by any ingenuity both lose it himself and secure it for him. This lady seemed to Frank to be one of the most amiable, kind, and tender-hearted of mothers. But Mrs. Butt was a loud-spoken person. And, unfortunately for Franks magnanimo...
