

Survival Fire: making fire after your supplies run out

In a world where you are using the supplies that you have stored for emergencies, you will run out of those supplies. That's just the way it is. You could be on a camping trip and lose your back pack over a cliff or in a fast moving stream. You could be away from home on a vacation or business trip and not have supplies with you. You could be sitting at home when we have a Solar Flare like the Carrington Event of 1859 that causes the Electrical grid to crash. There are many things that could cause you to need to use your supplies. This book is part of a series that is concerned with after your supplies run out. Fire is one of the most important tools for survival. You can cook, stay warm, or boil water so that it's safe to drink. Every time you use your fire starting tools or materials could be the last time. Flints break or chip...or just wear out. Lighter fluid gets used or leaks out. Wicks burn down or matches get wet or used up. This book will help you learn how to build a fire with the materials found in just about every environment, and with practice, your fires can be started almost as fast with your home made tools as with the cool old Zippo lighter.
